Although Spain and other new EU member states are still part of the EEC, the government has been instrumental in negotiating the terms of Spain's access to the EEC. The process of Spain's accession to the EEC was facilitated by the European Council, which consists of the heads of state or government of the member states. Spain's accession negotiations were conducted within the framework of the Edinburgh Agreement, which was signed in December 1985. The agreement provided for Spain's accession to the EEC on January 1, 1986.

The negotiations for Spain's accession were complex, involving discussions on a wide range of issues, including trade, agriculture, and regional policy. Spain was granted special concessions, such as a five-year grace period for its agricultural sector to comply with EEC standards, and a phased implementation of EEC laws and regulations.

The accession of Spain to the EEC was a significant milestone in the country's economic development and integration into the European Union. It allowed Spain to benefit from the advantages of the EEC's single market and to participate in the decision-making process of the European Union.

The process of accession also had political implications, as it marked the start of a new era in Spain's foreign policy. Spain's accession to the EEC was seen as a symbol of its commitment to European integration and its willingness to align with the values and norms of the European Union.

In conclusion, Spain's accession to the EEC was a major turning point in the country's history. It opened up new opportunities for economic growth and political stability and strengthened Spain's position in the European Union.

The AP's proposal for the Paspich accession of the Economic Commission for Europe to the European Community is a strong endorsement of the AP's position on the accession of the EEC as a space for the Community. The AP has always been clear that the enlargement of the EEC to the AP's countries should be a priority for the EEC and would welcome the EC's accession to the Community. However, the AP's proposal for the Paspich accession of the EEC to the Community is a response to the current situation in Europe, where the EC is facing significant difficulties in dealing with the accession of new members. The AP is convinced that the accession of the EEC to the Community would be a positive step towards the creation of a European Community that is capable of dealing with the challenges of the 21st century.
The Accession of Portugal and Greece to the European Community was completed in 1986, with the aim of expanding the European Community's membership. The European Community, also known as the Common Market, was established in 1957 with the aim of facilitating trade among its member states.

Portugal and Greece applied for membership in 1974 and 1979, respectively. The accession process was lengthy and involved numerous negotiations and agreements. The European Council, which is the highest decision-making body of the European Union, finally approved the accession of Portugal and Greece in 1985.

The accession of Portugal and Greece was significant for several reasons. Firstly, it expanded the European Community's geographical reach and economic footprint. Secondly, it signaled a shift in European policy, as countries outside of the Mediterranean basin began to participate in the European project.

The accession process involved several stages, including the negotiation of accession treaties, the ratification of these treaties by the member states, and the achievement of specific economic and social criteria. Portugal and Greece had to demonstrate their commitment to the European project and their ability to meet the necessary conditions for membership.

The accession of Portugal and Greece also had implications for the internal market, which was one of the original pillars of the European Community. The integration of Portugal and Greece into the internal market would require the harmonization of national laws and regulations with European Union standards.

In conclusion, the accession of Portugal and Greece to the European Community was a significant milestone in the history of the European Union. It marked the expansion of the European project beyond the Mediterranean basin and signaled a new phase in the integration of European countries.
solid projects for European policy. None of the EC — more so for the Commission, the political arm of the state — can afford to ignore the potential consequences of the decision. The Commission must ensure that the Single European Act is not used to delay the implementation of the proposal.

The European Parliament has already rejected the Commission’s proposal for a new method of implementing the Single European Act. This rejection has been interpreted as a victory for the Commissioners and a defeat for the European Parliament. However, the European Parliament has not yet formally rejected the Commission’s proposal. It has only expressed its concerns about the implications of the proposal for the future of the European Union.

The European Parliament has also expressed its concerns about the implications of the Single European Act for the economic and social policies of the European Union. It has called on the European Union to ensure that the Single European Act does not undermine the social and economic policies of the European Union.

In conclusion, the European Parliament has rejected the Commission’s proposal for a new method of implementing the Single European Act. The European Parliament has also expressed its concerns about the implications of the Single European Act for the economic and social policies of the European Union.
